Paranormal Pages
Ed's Word

Paranormal Unity: Is It Just a Dream? As we begin spreading the word that the first 12-months of advertising for Paranormal Pages is now complete, which is very exciting, I've been speaking with many people across the paranormal field about supporting the next stage of our journey.

What I'm hearing, however, is not always brilliant.

We are not here to bag out specific people or companies. That has never been the purpose of Paranormal Pages. Our focus is to help educate, connect and support people interested in all things paranormal, supernatural, spiritual and unexplained. We do our best to work with people who have ethics, specific skill sets and reputations that stand up to scrutiny.

Yet over the past couple of months, some concerning themes have continued to surface across the wider field. There have been people appearing in mainstream media for all the wrong reasons, ongoing scams reportedly ripping people off for thousands of dollars, operators charging large fees for tours or events that do not appear to deliver what was promised. It seems people are saying one thing publicly, while doing something quite different behind the scenes.

Even here at Paranormal Pages, we have experienced some of this first-hand.

We know there are dodgy operators in every industry. However, because the paranormal field is still considered "woo-woo" by many, when poor behaviour is exposed, it can reflect badly on everyone involved.

That is why unity, ethics and transparency matter.

The paranormal field is filled with dedicated investigators, researchers, spiritual workers, tour operators, writers, teachers and businesses all doing excellent work. There are people genuinely trying to support others, educate the public and build something meaningful.

That is the field we want to help grow.

Paranormal Pages was created to offer a positive, ethical and inclusive platform for those who are serious about their work and passionate about the unexplained. It is not about ego, competition or tearing others down. It is about connection, awareness and helping the public find people and services they can trust.

So, is paranormal unity just a dream?

Maybe not.

Maybe it starts with choosing carefully who we support, how we show up, what we promote and whether our actions match our words.

If you have encountered something beyond easy explanation, or you guide others through these spaces, consider this your invitation. Reach out we are here to explore and share!

Ghost Talk: Experienced Opinions

Ask an Expert

Soula Raven Vaitsis from Paranormal Adventures Australia has been, and still is, a strong advocate in the paranormal field. With decades of experience, Soula has dedicated her life to promoting all things paranormal.

Each issue we'll pose your questions to our experienced panel. Send your questions to: editor@supernalmagazineaustralia.com.au

Q: What advice can you offer in regard to Paranormal Investigations?

A: The success of a paranormal investigation relies entirely on the expertise of the lead investigator. Participants look to this professional for safety, direction and technical authority throughout the experience.

Labelling these specialists as mere 'tour guides' misrepresents their extensive responsibilities, as they function fundamentally as active investigators and dedicated researchers.

An exceptional field leader brings seasoned experience, clinical objectivity and a background with a reputable, credible paranormal research organisation. Leaders possess deep knowledge of the location's documented history and architectural layout, allowing them to contextualise anomalies accurately.

They provide clear instructions on tool deployment, explaining the operational mechanics behind EMF meters, thermal imaging and audio capture devices. They actively walk participants through the venue, teaching proper field methodologies and investigating alongside the group in real time.

Elite investigators maintain an engaging, professional demeanour, welcoming technical inquiries regarding both the venue and broader paranormal theory. This clear contrast serves as the most reliable indicator of whether an event is being directed by a qualified specialist or an inexperienced operator.

Reader's Story

The Séance in Preston

It was the beginning of the school holidays when my older sister Liz invited a few of her friends over for a séance. I was aged about eleven at the time and Liz and her friends were around fourteen. There were six girls all up, full of excitement, curious and that nervous teenage bravery that often appears when people are about to do something they secretly know they probably should not.

Brett Henderson

At the time, we were living in an old 1950s house in Preston. It was the type of house that carried its own creaks and groans, especially once the daylight began to fade. The dining room became the chosen place for the afternoon's experiment.

The girls shut all the doors, covered the window with an old green army blanket as it was too bright. They lit several candles, leaving the room in a strange, flickering gloom.

In the centre of the dining room table, they placed a Ouija board.

At first, it was all laughter. There were whispers, giggles and dramatic looks between them. The mood was more sleepover mischief than serious spiritual work. From where I sat, quietly in the corner, I watched the whole event unfold with more curiosity than fear.

Then, the girls began calling on spirits to enter the room and communicate with them.

The change was subtle at first. The candle flames began to flicker, although there was no breeze. The air seemed to thicken. Then the temperature dropped. It was not just cool. It became cold enough for everyone in the room to notice. The laughter slowly died away.

Then came the noises.

There were bangs on the doors, sharp and forceful, as though something was trying to get in from the other side. The sound echoed through the enclosed room and instantly shifted the atmosphere. The girls' excitement dissolved into panic. Their voices rose and then turned to screams.

Being Catholics, the girls immediately began calling on Jesus for protection. What had started as a game suddenly felt very real to them. The room seemed to vibrate, almost as though the house itself was shuddering around us. The candles flared higher and brighter, their flames stretching unnaturally upward. At times, they seemed to reach halfway to the ceiling.

"Then, the girls began calling on spirits to enter the room and communicate with them."

I stayed in the corner, watching.

Suddenly, one of the girls pointed across the room and cried out that she could see the face of Jesus. From where I was sitting, I could see it too. It appeared clearly in the room: long, wavy brown hair, a gentle face and what looked like a calm smile. It was not a vague shadow or a trick of the eye to me in that moment. In the middle of the fear, screaming and chaos, the image seemed strangely peaceful.

That was the breaking point.

One of the girls screamed again and the whole group erupted. They burst through the doors and ripped the army blanket from the window, flooding the dining room with light. Some ran up the hallway and out the front door, desperate to escape whatever they believed had entered the room. Others stayed only long enough to pack away the board, blow out the candles and restore the room to something that looked normal.

I still remember one of the girls crying.

Then Liz looked at me and said very firmly, "Don't tell anyone, especially Mum."

"After that afternoon, I never played with a Ouija board again."

From my perspective, I was not especially frightened. I was curious. I had watched a group of teenage girls move from laughter to terror in a matter of minutes, while something strange seemed to build around them. The cold, the banging, the flaring candles, the vibrating room and the image they believed was Jesus, all became part of one unforgettable experience.

Was it a genuine spiritual encounter? Was it heightened emotion, suggestion and fear feeding on itself? Or was it something sitting somewhere between the two?

I cannot say for certain.

What I do know is that the memory never left me. That old dining room in Preston, the blocked-out window, the candles, the screams and that strange calm face in the room became my first real introduction to the idea that some doors, once opened, are not always easy to close.

One thing is certain. After that afternoon, I never played with a Ouija board again.
